Roelofs AA., Tersman K., Rolls S. J., Meyer R. Although short-term memory (STM) has been shown to be impaired in schizophrenia and related psychoses, the exact nature and mechanism of STM impairment in these disorders is still a topic of debate. The aim of this study was to investigate whether abnormalities in verbal and visuospatial STM in schizophrenia patients could be related to the reduced prefrontal gray matter volume (GMV) reported in this disorder. Using event-related potentials (ERPs), we investigated the time course of STM encoding and retrieval in 28 schizophrenia patients and 17 normal controls. Both groups had similar attention and speed of processing. Control subjects displayed shorter STM recall latency than patients, and this was related to reduced GMV in left prefrontal regions, i.e. the left inferior frontal gyrus (IFG) and the left ventrolateral prefrontal cortex (VLPFC). In contrast, patients with schizophrenia displayed the same STM recall latency as controls, which was not related to reduced GMV in these areas. In fact, GMV in the left medial temporal lobe (MTL) was negatively correlated with STM recall latency for both groups. This is the first study to show that while patients with schizophrenia have a normal pattern of MTL activation during STM retrieval, they have reduced GMV in the left prefrontal cortex. This cortical deficit, not detected using functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI), may contribute to the impairment of STM functioning in schizophrenia./* * Copyright (C) 2011, 2012 Apple Inc.
