Meanwhile, a lot of other companies that have released new games are doing so extremely quickly and nobody has the time to spend hours on releasing a review about their games on a site like The Video Game Awards. So, the purpose of this article is to hopefully put some pressure on publishers to be more responsible in the way they treat review sites, and to treat reviewers a bit better while creating more transparency between publisher and reviewer. The reason why it's important to raise awareness, is that it's really easy to publish reviews and be treated really well. So, if you are a reviewer and you want to write a good review, go ahead and review a lot of games and spread the word. And if you're not a reviewer and just want to read some good press for an upcoming game, then go ahead and subscribe to a few forums and sites like VGAR. It's a nice way to get some PR done and even if you don't want to write a review for that game, you can still recommend it, but understand why you should. This process applies to developers and their games

I'm trying to undertand the behaviour of Hibernate Search. In the example project from the main site below, they use JPQL to retrieve the product. The results are then used to create a new Product. The Product has a name and a list of categories, which is only used if the product belongs to one of them. To me this all makes sense, but I don't see what Hibernate Search is doing here. The documentation says (and I agree) that there should be no direct calls to the database, all queries should be done in Hibernate's methods. But to me this seems pretty pointless in this example because the results are not stored anywhere, so none of the queries will ever get executed anyway. I'd really appreciate if somebody could give me a better explanation why Hibernate Search is used in this example. Thanks
