The objective of this study was to evaluate whether or not bioequivalence of an oral pharmaceutical can be detected at the single-dose level in subjects with altered drug absorption when given under fasting conditions. While it has been demonstrated that therapeutic equivalence at steady-state conditions can be difficult to achieve for drugs that are substrates for active transport, the impact of absorption is not considered. Twelve healthy men were administered either 50 mg or 100 mg of the experimental drug (test) or 25 mg of the active drug (reference) under fasting conditions. Altered absorption was induced by p.o. administration of simethicone (approximately 2000 mg) and ingestion of milk (1 glass) 30 min prior to the administration of the drugs. Changes in the pharmacokinetic (PK) parameters and areas under the PK curves (AUC) were compared to reference product following the administration of both single doses of the reference and test products. The study was conducted under a double-blind, placebo-controlled, random sequence crossover design. Data were analyzed by means of a mixed effects analysis of variance. The 90% confidence interval (CI) of the ratios of the log-transformed AUC0-3 for the 2 products (test/reference) was within the prescribed range of 80-125% for all PK parameters. The 90% CIs for the ratio of the log-transformed Cmax and Tmax 3e33713323
