Light-induced structural changes in the bacterial phosphopantetheinyl transferase. The bifunctional phosphopantetheinyl transferase (PPTase, E.C. 2.4.2.15) of the bacterial coenzyme A biosynthetic pathway was studied by low-temperature fluorescence and Raman spectroscopy. In conjunction with the crystal structure of the conserved N-terminal domain, a detailed analysis was conducted to examine the structural features of the complex between the coenzyme A (CoA) of the substrates S-CoA and PPTase, which are covalently bound to the enzyme by the CoA-binding domains (CBDs) N3 and N4. For the first time, the fluorescence properties of the CoA-PPTase complex have been investigated, and the protein conformational changes induced by the binding of the different ligands and their relationship with the reported crystal structures were studied. In contrast to previous results in solution, the complex was found to be unstructured in the absence of S-CoA, which led to the conclusion that the CoA moiety of S-CoA is essential to stabilize the native fold of the PPTase in solution. Spectroscopic evidence also supports the conclusion that the complex of CoA-PPTase can be considered as a conformational equilibrium and that the fold of the N-terminal domain of the protein is stabilized by the bound CoA in the context of the full-length PPTase. The effects on this stabilization on ligand binding and the global protein fold were also investigated.

New Research Suggests After-care Rises for Teenagers Whose Parents Give Their Adolescence a Bad Example Date: 11/17/2006 Source: First Direct, Fitch STUDY: After-care costs for young people whose parents make 'disadvantaged choices' rise After-care costs for young people whose parents make 'disadvantaged choices' rise after they become unemployed, according to a study of 4,000 15-year-olds. The study, published in the journal Child Abuse & Neglect, identified an 'essential role' for after-care services in helping young people to reduce the risks associated with their upbringing. After-care costs for the young people were found to rise the longer they had spent in their parents' care, according to First Direct, which commissioned the study. The study, launched by the Fitch ratings agency, identified an 'essential role' for after-care services in helping young people to reduce the risks associated with their upbringing. After-care costs for the young people were found to rise the longer they had spent in their parents' care, according to First Direct, which commissioned the study. Fitch ratings agency. The average cost of after-care services over the four years was £9.90 per week per young person, rising to £2.60 for those who had spent up to 10 years with their parents. After 10 years, costs were £1.60. The average cost per week of after-care services was estimated to be £9.90 (£2.60 for those who had spent up to 10 years in their parents' care) and rose to £2.60 (£1.60 for those who had spent up to 10 years in their parents' care) after 10 years. Although most parents opt for the more expensive after-care options, only a third were willing to pay for all the services provided. Only 3% reported that the after-care they received was not worth the extra money and 0.5% had a serious complaint about it. "Parents' behaviour in the early years has a lasting effect on their children," says Dr Christine Robertson, director of policy for First Direct. "It is therefore important that the children receive the best possible care when they are young, to help protect them from the effects of neglect and abuse and other adverse effects on their development." Based on a sample of 4,000
