To compare the short-term effects of hypnotic drug classes on insomnia-related outcomes (trouble falling asleep, waking frequently during the night, feeling rested and refreshed the next morning) from a national cohort of US community-dwelling individuals. Advertisements and a survey were used to recruit a national cohort of persons with insomnia. Participants answered questionnaires about their sleep-related problems and medication use over the previous 2 weeks. A multi-dose, randomized, parallel-group, double-blind design was used to compare the 2-week effects of zolpidem, zaleplon and eszopiclone on insomnia-related outcomes. Eighty-eight participants were included in the study; 82 were available for the analysis. The overall treatment effect of all drug classes on each outcome measure was not statistically significant. However, the sleep quality component of the Pittsburgh Sleep Quality Index and the number of waking episodes per night differed significantly by drug class. Although insomnia-related outcomes did not differ significantly overall, there were significant differences in the Pittsburgh Sleep Quality Index component and the number of waking episodes per night between drug classes. Additional research is needed to assess the comparative effectiveness of these three classes of hypnotics in long-term treatment and other outcomes.Isolation of the Listeria monocytogenes surface protein PdpA from humans with listeriosis and production of polyclonal and monoclonal antibodies.
