Driver.Conventionally, an image forming apparatus, such as a multi-functional peripheral (MFP), is provided with a communication means for communicating with a personal computer (PC) or the like. The image forming apparatus reads image data from a medium, such as a memory card or a hard disk, and converts the read image data into image data, which is then transferred to the PC. The image forming apparatus obtains, using the communication means, information about a device (hereinafter referred to as "device information") relating to the image forming apparatus (or the medium), such as information about the capacity of a memory device and information about the present position of a paper jam. Thereby, the image forming apparatus prevents an operation error, such as out of paper, which could occur due to an abnormal state of the image forming apparatus (or the medium). In particular, the image forming apparatus transfers the information about the capacity of the memory device, such as the capacity of a memory card used as a memory device, to the PC. The PC, which has read the information, can recognize the information and decide whether or not a memory card (to be mounted in the image forming apparatus) can be used. The image forming apparatus, based on the memory capacity information, preferably reduces a print output according to the memory capacity of a memory card, which is a storage device, such that the memory capacity information is reflected on an output image. Thereby, the print output of the image forming apparatus can be reduced, which can be used to reduce the electricity consumption of the image forming apparatus. Patent Document 1 describes a technique which instructs a load device to request an unused memory capacity from a print server when the memory capacity of an unused memory card becomes less than a predetermined value. Thereby, a backup operator can search for an unused memory card with the largest unused memory capacity and use the unused memory card, and thus efficiency of the backup operation
