Arsenic is ubiquitous in the environment and is an important pollutant of surface water, drinking water and food. In mammals, arsenic-based compounds exert high toxic effects because they interact with a variety of intracellular targets. However, the mechanism by which arsenic induces negative effects in many cells is not completely understood. In order to identify cellular targets regulated by arsenite in Trypanosoma cruzi, we performed a high-throughput screening to identify small RNA that decreases in abundance after arsenite exposure. This screening identified a group of small RNAs specifically downregulated by arsenite in this parasite. The steady-state levels of a representative of this group of small RNAs decreased after the exposure of epimastigotes to 100 µM of arsenite. The downregulation of this small RNA is prevented by the addition of the proteasome inhibitor MG-132, suggesting that this decrease may occur due to proteasomal degradation. Using a construct expressing the GFP reporter, we have shown that this small RNA is distributed in discrete cytoplasmic foci associated with the nucleus. In contrast to the intracellular small RNAs generated
