Google has come under fire for issuing only a brief statement on the incident and leaving the public in the dark. A GoFundMe campaign for the crew and passengers of the ill-fated ship has, however, raised over $100,000 for them. Shortly after the Costa Concordia went down on the night of 12 January, while carrying 4,200 people back from a supposedly "holiday" trip to Tuscany, Italy, it became clear that all the passengers on board were unaware of their fate. Seventy-two people have since been confirmed dead, with another 21 missing and presumed dead. The Coast Guard told those on board to remain in their cabins and avoid swimming, and rescue missions reportedly were delayed for hours because the Concordia's captain, Francesco Schettino, allegedly gave the order to "save his crew." Around 50 people were on board the ship's bridge when Schettino, who is now in police custody, allegedly gave the command. Google's refusal to acknowledge the fate of the passengers, beyond telling them they can "see their photos and videos," has been criticized as disgraceful. In the aftermath of the Mediterranean tragedy, Google's official Twitter account, @Google, has issued only one statement: "We are aware of the Costa Concordia tragedy. Our thoughts are with the passengers and families." In a second statement, Google said: "We will certainly not be allowing the tragedy on the coast of Tuscany to interfere with people's online activities...
