version of Bichiho is a remastered version of the classic game, which had been originally published by Fujio Yoshida / Takeru Kimata / Art & Science in 1986. Bichiho Classic received awards at the 34th Japan Game Awards (the Entertainment Magazine Awards (Best Game of the Year) in 1985. But since we heard that it is not always being sold together with the new 20-disc DVD set called Bichiho Grand Collection, we also decided to release this version for all to play. The Bichiho Classic game features the same game world as the Final Fantasy VII main series. The job system has also been revised for this version. Bichiho Classic features four player versus and two player versus AI modes. While most of the game world has been newly drawn, more areas have also been added. * Create a party of up to three characters. * Most weapons, including magic/spells, will be automatically equipped. * The dungeon is randomly generated every time you start a new game. * The town will not be generated every time you start a new game. * You cannot talk to other characters once you enter the dungeon. * Your castle and overland map have been newly drawn. * You can play with other players or against AI characters in both multiplayer and single player modes. * You can fight a boss his 8-hour Poem is gradually repeated at diminishing volume until it is heard but once. Some earlier performances (by Richard Kludy, Ryszard Telder, pianist Harry Partch, Karlheinz Stockhausen, and others) used magnetic tape to record the repetitions, but since Cage intended to repeat the sound of a radio, electronic media appeared ideal, and by 1971 electro-acoustic instruments such as the radio-frequency synthesizer were being utilized to recreate the sound of the original recording. The piece was premiered on December 5, 1971 at the Phillips Collection in Washington, D.C. The performance lasted eight hours (from 3:30 p.m. until 11:10 p.m.) and then resumed the next day. In a 1971 issue of The Village Voice, Bruce Alvarado wrote, "There is no substitute for the actual sound of a radio." The audio itself is heard from a small radio receiver which was the only recording device at that point. It was inserted in a wooden box that Cage had built, it had controls on the front that allowed the singer and audience to follow the sounds as they were broadcast repeatedly on a four-minute tape loop. X The Rectifier is a free release from Percussion section. User can download it absolutely free and is allowed to use X The Rectifier without limitation.
